C-11 WORK PERMIT

C11 lets entrepreneurs and self-employed individuals apply for a work permit that does not require LMIA.

Essentially, the C11 work permit is for two types of entrepreneurs. The first group is those entrepreneurs who want a temporary entry to Canada based on their entrepreneurial plans and careers. The second group seeks the C11 work permit in the context of the entrepreneurial or self-employed permanent residence program

Whether you are looking for a temporary stay or permanent residency with your C11 entrepreneur work permit, you need to prove to the immigration officer that:

- You own a business yourself or are a self-employed individual with a viable business plan and resources.
- The business/venture/self-employed gig you run can bring considerable economic as well as social and cultural benefits for Canadian citizens.

If an applicant can satisfy the immigration officer for these two things, they will be awarded the C11 entrepreneur work permit.

What Does “Significant Benefit” to Canada Mean?

Sometimes a CII work permit gets approved or disapproved based on its “significant benefit to Canada” outlook. As mentioned earlier, the immigration officer assesses the applicant’s proposed business or a business plan for its significant benefit to the country. These are some points that highlight what “significant benefit to Canada” implies.

- The work the applicant plans to do will create an economic stimulus for Canadians and permanent residents. The economic stimulus can mean different things. For instance, it entails the creation of new jobs, growth of Canadian exports, or development work in any particular region in the country.
- The work the applicant plans to do will result in industry advancement in the country. The industry advancement can also be interpreted in different ways. Usually, the immigration officer considers a business bringing industry advancement if it: involves technological development, product/service innovation, and differentiation, or improving the skills of the Canadian workforce.
- The work the applicant plans to do is generally favourable to Canadian society with no harmful consequences and doesn’t encroach upon the operations of Canadian businesses.

Who Qualifies For a C11 Work Permit?

It is important to understand that owning a business in your home country is not enough to qualify for the C11 work permit. If you want to improve your chances of qualifying for the C11 work permit for Canada, you need to be mindful of things that immigration officers usually use as a yardstick to determine if an applicant is eligible for the C11 work permit.

- The applicant has the history and aptitude to set up a successful venture or they have the resources and skillset to purchase an existing Canada-based business and turn it into a profitable entity.
- The applicant has at least 50% of the ownership of the business they buy or establish in Canada.
- The applicant has a well-thought-out business plan that is realistic and makes sense in practical settings.
- The applicant can create a set of activities that can benefit Canada and Canadians in various fields and across different walks of life.
- The applicant has done enough groundwork to establish their business/work in Canada. For instance, they must have secured finances for the establishment of the business. Entrepreneurs should also have a staffing plan ready and shortlist a location to buy/get on rent before applying for the C11 work permit. Similarly, they must have started developing a network of Canadian associates, suppliers, vendors, etc while applying for the C11 entrepreneur work permit.
